before purchasing it in order to gauge whether or not it would be worth my time, and all praised Mount Rogers National Recreation Area [Jefferson National Forest] (National Geographic Trails Illustrated Map):

By Roger Dodger
I've used several NatGeo topo maps in the past and figured this would be a no-brainer, but I gotta say, I'm really disappointed in National Geographic's attempt at this map. The primary point of interest, (THE TITLE OF THE MAP) encompasses about 1/8 of the entire map. There is a whole lot of useless geography covered and the resolution on the good stuff is too small to use on a serious level. I do not recommend and will be sending it back. You're better off printing off maps you can find online.

What is on the paper is great! Nat Geo always provides detailed maps. My issue with the map is that there are holes in the map along some of the creases. I hope it holds up. I checked other maps at a local store and they had the same issue. I guess the rollers that crease the maps are a little too rough on the paper.

The Mt. Rogers NRA is a rather large area for a topo map to cover, and in fact the contours are a bit hard to read on this map. There is a larger-scale inset for the immediate Mr. Rogers/Grayson Highlands SP area, though. Mileages are not indicated on the trails, unlike some other TI products (e.g. the "Mt Rogers High Country" TI map), and there is some confusion on the names and numbers for the myriad small roads in the immediate neighborhood of the NRA; this is a significant problem because it's excellent biking country. Over the whole, this map is more than adequate for the serious traveler who doesn't want to fool with GPS gadgets. I don't know what's available in that line.
